a growing body of evidence, though, suggests that in-utero exposure to illegal drugs does not hobble children for life in the way that some state officials fear.